Colorado Front Range Trail is the name for the entire trail system, which one day will run from Wyoming to New Mexico, along the Front Range of Colorado, totaling 876 miles. For more information on the progress of the Colorado Front Range Trail Project, visit cpw.state.co.us. In El Paso County, the multi-use trail system is roughly 43 continuous miles. The surface varies from dirt and gravel to asphalt and concrete, with a gradual downhill slope when heading south. Depending on where you are on this north-west transportation corridor, it has different names. The northern section begins in Palmer Lake, north of Monument, and is more commonly known as the New Santa Fe Regional Trail. This segment is generally straight and level and stretches about 17 miles through natural, open areas. The trail is six-foot wide and primarily gravel. The US Air Force Academy provides a crucial 6.9 mile trail easement, do NOT go off trail on Air Force Academy Property.

Near Woodman Road, the trail transitions to a new segment called the Pikes Peak Greenway. Pikes Peak Greenway runs north to south across the whole city of Colorado Springs. It travels alongside I-25, Monument Creek and Fountain Creek from just south of the Air Force Academy in the north to Fountain in the south; it's around 16 miles. It connects to a number of other trails and has multiple trailheads making it a very popular route for pedestrians and cyclists in the city. The trail is mostly

Why Here? Why Now?

- Colorado Springs is one of the few major cities without a public botanic garden
- Surge in popularity for sustainability, education and safe community gathering places outdoors
- Prime opportunity to promote tourism, economic growth, programming, and environmental awareness
