Summary:

There was a recent change to the Colorado Veterinary Practice Act (CRS 12-315-105(q)) updating the requirements for the administration of rabies vaccinations in animal shelters. The new language, which is reflective of the national standards set in the National Compendium on Rabies, allows rabies vaccinations to be administered under the indirect supervision of a licensed veterinarian in shelters and rescues. Changing the law to allow rabies vaccinations to be administered under the indirect supervision of a licensed veterinarian allows shelters to vaccinate the animals efficiently and effectively in their care, while also maintaining access to the medical expertise of a licensed veterinarian
